The exhibition given under the supervision of George W. Hoit, of Omaha, was satisfactory to everyone. He represents the Nebraska Phonograph company, and A. R. Gates is the Helena agent.

The phonograph is not a new invention, but in its present perfected form it is a novelty in the west. When the wizard of Menlo park invented the wonderful machine, it is doubtful whether he imagined that it could be put to the practical purposes it is now used for. It is a perfect mechanical stenographer. It records and reproduces any word or sound of the voice. Charley tuned his African harp, played a lively air and sang a plantation song, the little needle recording each note upon the revolving cylinder. When he had finished Mr. Hoit reversed the needles and handed the conductor to Charley, who was over his fright by this time, and who placed the prongs to his ears with a steady hand. The cylinder began to revolve and the musican began to show evident signs of delight. He grinned until the music was finished, when laying down the conductor he stepped back and looked at the little machine with a look of admiration. I know what it is now.
